The high-speed rail network

Accessing major European centres from Euregio Meuse-Rhine

Speed and reliability are nowadays the most important criteria confronting a transport system. High-speed rail transport (HST) currently offers a viable alternative in international competition with flying or driving.

The European Union has set itself the ambitious goal of establishing a high-speed rail network. The Euregio Meuse-Rhine, with its high-speed rail stops in Aachen and Liège, forms part of this European network.

From Aachen and Liège, major European cities can be reached within short travelling times with modern high-speed trains such as Thalys and ICE.

High-speed stopping points are extremely valuable transport nodes in the European rail network and require corresponding rapid and convenient connections with regional transport networks.

The planned rail link Euregio Circle Line, which provides cross border, continuous and fast connections between the important cities of the Euregio Meuse-Rhine and thus also with the high-speed train stations, is an important cornerstone of an Euregional and intraregional development network.

Accessing major European centres from Euregio Meuse-Rhine

In a period of time dominated by information technology and mobility and characterized by increasingly more dynamic and complex cross border interrelationships, our operating radius has expanded enormously and our mobility options must adapt accordingly to accommodate this.

While the "in between" position of the Euregio Meuse-Rhine means an advantageous location, it also presents an enormous challenge to the transport infrastructure needed to link the intra and inter-regional network.
